

The use of protective eyewear during dental procedures is not only a good safety and hygiene practice, and is mandated by OSHA guidelines.

Face and Eye Shields

Routine veterinary dental work using ultrasonic scalers/polishers and high speed handpieces creates aerosol and spatter. The aerosol consists of saliva, water, and microbes - plus blood and tooth debris can sometimes be present. Every veterinarian and technician knows that dog and cat bite wounds are readily infected with the plethora of serious bacteria living in the animal's oral cavity.

Protective eyewear not only protects the eyes, nose, and mouth (with a face shield) from contact with infectious agents, but also against any physical damage from propelled objects including tooth or calculus fragments becoming dislodged.
